The Indian Ocean has been a major trade route for centuries, and as a result, it has been home to a number of diaspora communities. The earliest known diaspora communities in the Indian Ocean were those of Arab and Indian traders. These communities established themselves in port cities along the coast of East Africa, Southeast Asia, and India. Over time, these communities grew and became increasingly influential in the local economies and politics. In some cases, these diaspora communities even established their own independent states. One example of this is the Swahili Coast, which was a string of city-states along the coast of East Africa that was ruled by Arab and Indian traders.
